Fraud and Security the Next Generation!

Debbie Smart

In today's world of online banking and cash management, we are all familiar with the use of multi-factor authentication such as tokens. These types of tools are very important in mitigating fraud and risk, and can be compared to the locks and chains that we put on the front door of our house to keep the crooks out. But despite our best efforts, sometimes the bad guys get in anyway. So what do we do then? This session will address the next level of security - the "motion detectors" that show abnormal behavior and the effective use of "alarms" that can be brought not only to the attention of financial institutions, but also the "alarms" that can help corporate customers mitigate their own risk. Can you afford NOT to attend this session?
